Jonathan Shead

WRA 210 002

Module 8

Summary of Changes:

      Going back into my index file and looking at the material that is already there, while also taking into account material that will soon be there, I decided it was time to organize myself a bit better. There weren't too many changes made. I simply added a few new parent folders and adjusted my index file accordingly. A few of the new folders I created were "modules", "wireframes", "designpages", and "sitemap". Thus far, that is the only content I have in my index file. And so with that I simply combined alike material into a more general file. For example, if I ever need to look back at the design choices I made, I can click open the "designpages" folder and see the various pages, typecard, and color palletes I previously created. This makes it more effective so that I'm not stuck scrolling up and down looking for the specific item needed. By putting most, if not all, of my files into new folders I have gotten rid of many organization problems as well as simple clutter.